

S A M V A D

~ The Kalpa Saga ~

The Conversation Before the First Breath

In the beginning, there was neither existence nor non-existence. Neither light nor darkness. Neither life nor death.

There was only One, breathing without breath, present without form, aware without thought.

Then, without sound, without light, without movement, something stirred.

Before stars found their place, before mountains learned to stand, before oceans knew their shores, before the first word knew it was a word, two eternal presences remained.

One that flows.

One that witnesses.

Not enemies. Not rivals. Two halves of the same truth.

Between them existed an endless conversation. Never spoken. Never heard. Simply ... known.

THE CONVERSATION

TIME

They are afraid again.

I feel it in their sleepless nights, in the way they cling to people and moments that were never meant to stay.

They call this feeling anxiety. Loneliness. Emptiness.

But I know what it truly is.

Deep inside, they are beginning to sense what they have forgotten.

THE DIVINE

Every soul feels it someday.

It is the soul reminding itself that it is far greater than the life it currently remembers.

TIME

They live as though this world is permanent.

They love as though separation is forever.

They fear death as though it is the end.

Should we tell them the truth?

THE DIVINE

What truth would you tell?

TIME

That they are not just this body.

That this world is not the whole of reality.

That the face they wear every day is only one among many.

Many wear it so long that they forget it was ever a mask.

THE DIVINE

And if you told them ... would they believe you?

Or would they return to their routines, their distractions, their comfortable certainties, calling it an interesting thought before forgetting it by tomorrow?

Some truths cannot be taught. They must be remembered.

TIME

Then tell me ... what is this place?

THE DIVINE

This is Mrityu Loka.

Not because humans die here. Every realm has an end. It is called the Realm of Mortality because only here can a soul truly experience loss.

And only by losing can it discover what can never be lost.

Here, the infinite accepts a name. The eternal wears a mortal body. The limitless chooses to forget itself, so that one day, remembering becomes meaningful.

TIME

And when they die?

THE DIVINE

For one moment, the forgetting lifts.

Like a fog that has covered a mountain for so long that people forgot there was a mountain, and then, in one clear morning, the fog is gone. And they remember. They remember who they truly are.

Some choose to rest. Some choose to return because their journey is unfinished. Some return because someone still waits to be loved.

The choice belongs to the soul. Not to Me.

TIME

Yet while they live, they blame everything on destiny. Whenever life breaks them, they say, "It was written." It comforts them.

THE DIVINE

Because blaming destiny is easier than understanding themselves.

Destiny, as they imagine it, is something outside them. But the truth is different.

TIME

Then what guides a life?

THE DIVINE

Adi Swabhav. The original nature. The deepest truth already living within every soul.

A person's choices slowly reveal that nature. If someone repeatedly chooses anger, anger shapes the road ahead. If someone repeatedly chooses compassion, compassion becomes their path.

They call the result destiny. But it is simply their own nature unfolding.

TIME

So destiny is not entirely false.

THE DIVINE

No. It is only misunderstood.

Nothing is written for them. Something is written within them.

Knowing your true nature is not surrendering to fate. It is becoming free from it.

TIME

But this universe, this particular one, I feel strain in it. Power growing faster than the wisdom to carry it. Knowledge expanding faster than the compassion to guide it.

I have witnessed universes reach this point before. The fracture lines are familiar.

Two who share one blood, standing on opposite banks of the same river, each certain the other has betrayed the water. This one feels close to the edge.

A stillness. Not alarm. Not urgency. Something far older, far steadier: the stillness of something that has already decided.

THE DIVINE

This one will not fall.

TIME

You are certain? Even with the fractures. Even with the imbalance. Even with what is coming.

THE DIVINE

Because it is already set.

Time, for the first time in longer than memory, pauses. The current, which has never once hesitated in all of existence, holds itself still.

TIME

Set. You mean you have already placed something.

THE DIVINE

Yes. A fragment of my Will inside this universe. Not to dominate. Not to fix. Not to remove the necessity of struggle, because struggle is the whole point.

Just enough to hold the balance at the moment it would otherwise break. Just enough to ensure that completion remains possible.

It will not announce itself. It rarely does. It will look, from the outside, like an ordinary soul, living an ordinary life, carrying a name no different from any other name, until the day the name itself becomes a kind of seal, and the one who bears it understands, at last, what it was always sealing shut.

TIME

This has never happened in this universe's entire cycle.

THE DIVINE

No. It has not.

Time grows quieter. Not smaller, but quieter. The way deep water is quieter than shallow water, not because less is happening, but because what is happening is too large for surface noise.

TIME

I find myself wishing that the souls in other universes could witness what is unfolding here. The forgetting. The fracturing. The slow and painful remembering. It is the oldest story, told again in the newest way.

Perhaps that is why they build mirrors without knowing why they build them: not glass and silver, but habits, cities, small rituals of reflection, each one a shadow of a realm they cannot yet see, where every choice unmade still waits, patient, on the other side.

THE DIVINE

It has a witness.

TIME

Like Vyasa witnessed the great war? The collapse of Dharma. The voice of the Divine on a battlefield between two armies of the same blood. He held a mirror to an entire civilization and made them see themselves clearly, perhaps for the first time.

THE DIVINE

Yes. But this one is not Vyasa. Vyasa carried the memory of an age. This one is only beginning. He carries something smaller, but perhaps more rare.

TIME

What does he carry?

THE DIVINE

Sincerity. And sincerity, genuine, unperforming, asking nothing in return, bends reality more quietly and more permanently than talent ever could.

TIME

He is writing right now, isn't he.

Not a question. An observation. The way Time observes everything: not with surprise, but with the quiet recognition of something it has been watching come toward this moment for a long time.

THE DIVINE

Yes. He is writing at this very moment. In a quiet room. In an ordinary world that does not yet know what moves beneath it. He is writing without fully understanding why he cannot stop, without knowing that the story chose him before he chose it.

Am I correct, Aryan Srivastava?

And somewhere, in a room that is just a room, in a world that is just a world, in a life that feels ordinary from the inside, a young man pauses. And feels, for one strange and fleeting second, that the words he is writing are also writing him.

This is The Kalpa Saga.

A story about what you forget when you are born, and what you remember when you are ready.

About souls who descended with purpose and woke up in ordinary lives.

About love that existed before the people who feel it.

About a universe on the edge of remembering what it truly is.

And about a young man who is writing it all down, sincerely, imperfectly, and exactly as it needs to be written.